“ I met Frank when he was a skinny, quiet kid of 13. He hauled his bag into his summer bedroom at the old house on 30th St. (I think) in Houston and then stood in the door frame with his hands in his jean pockets, a half-smile, and an already intense look to those Floeck eyes. Over the next years, I took him and his friends to the movies, took him and his date to a school dance (I did have a '67 Mustang he particularly wanted to ride in), and, later, drove around Giddings with him while he talked about nothing in particular. Then life changes and distance meant I didn't see him for many, many years. But the few times that I did, he was still quiet, still stood with his hands in his pockets, made every effort to see Tara when she came to visit Giddings, and was just a good man to his last day, I'm certain. Special condolences to his daughter; Frank never allowed time or distance to separate them. My thoughts and love to the family that will wrap one another in memories and laughter.
